

What "Zoolander" teach us about Derek Jeter

The title character of the movie "Zoolander" is a male model who has two signature looks; "blue steel" and "le tigre". The movie's antagonist is driven to the point of criminal insanity by Zoolander's unmerited celebrity and, in particular, by the fact that blue steel and le tigre are indistinguishable from one another.

Zoolander

Would it be uncharitable of us to point out the similarities between Zoolander and his fellow famed pretty-boy, Derek Jeter? Like the former, the latter is celebrated for two trivial and Jeter. Or wait- is it the other way around?

essentially identical feats. These are the "Derek"; a three-hop seeing-eye ground ball that somehow dribbles through the left side of the infield, and the "Jeter"; a lame-assed bloop that falls to earth well in front of even the shallowest-positioned rightfielder.

Reality happily being different from the movies, no Jeter-distracted BLOHARD has yet, to our knowledge, hatched plans for world domination. Nevertheless, caution would seem to warrant to earliest possible end to the Jeter era. And -oh, if the comparison was uncharitable, never mind.